ality campaign, in which Mr. Hearst ran against Mr. McClellan, told an interesting story, and said that he knew it was true. He declared that the deal between Hearst and Odell in 1965 was originally that Hearst should have himself nominated for mayor and then withdraw in favor of some Republican candidate whom Odell would allow him to name, thus combining the Municipal Ownership forces with the Republican faithful for the defeat of Mayor McClellan.

The other statements to which special exception is taken by Hearst appeared in a subsequent issue of the Times as follows:

"The linking of the name of William Randolph Hearst with that of E. H. Harriman set a good deal of political gossip going. Mr. Hearst was known to have made a deal with Odell last fall over the assembly nominations, and a similar deal the year before on the aldermanic nominations. In the gossip yesterday, Mr. Odell's name was again mentioned as a possible connection.

The linking of Washington. Admiral Evans was badly wounded near the close of the civil war, and earned his cognomen of "Fighting Bob" at Valparaiso, Chile, in 1891, when the people of Chile were much inflamed against the United States and tried to attack some members of Evans' ship, the Yorktown. He has written a book entitled "A Sailor's Log," which was published in 1991.

The late Bishop John F. Hurst, founder of the American University and its first chancellor, was noted for his genial and sympathetic nature. But like the old musician who did not shrink from severely criticising a beautiful woman's singing, because, though woman was dear, music was dearer. Bishop Hurst's heart was tender toward young theological students, yet his love for learning made him demand that everything be kept up to a high standard. In the delightful blography of Bishop Hurst, by Albert Osborn, I find the following story, which illustrates this: Bishop Hurst was presiding over a conference in the South:
